

Brad Turner-Little

President & CEO

National Association of Workforce Boards

Brad Turner-Little is a distinguished leader in the field of workforce development and currently serves as the President and CEO of the National Association of Workforce Boards (NAWB). With a career marked by dedication and innovation, his journey in the nonprofit sector has made a lasting impact on communities and individuals across the U.S.

Before assuming his role at NAWB, Turner-Little honed his expertise and leadership skills during his tenure at Goodwill Industries International (GII) and Easterseals, where he served in various key positions, most recently as GII's Vice President of Strategy and Network Experience. With a deep commitment to empowering individuals through employment and skills development, his responsibilities included spearheading strategic initiatives, driving membership support, and advocating for policies that supported workforce development and job training.

Throughout his career, Turner-Little has shown an unwavering dedication to improving workforce opportunities for all Americans. As the President and CEO of NAWB, he continues to champion workforce development, collaborating with industry leaders, policymakers, and local workforce boards to create sustainable, inclusive, and innovative solutions that strengthen the nation's workforce and economy. His profound experience and commitment to the cause have made him a respected figure in the field, driving economic vitality in communities and fostering economic empowerment for individuals from all walks of life.

A graduate of Wake Forest University, Brad holds a Masters of Divinity Degree in Christian Social Ministry from Southern Baptist Theological Seminary and resides in Damascus, MD.